

WEEKLY CAPITOL UPDATE Monday, September 12th, 2022

VETO SESSION TO CONVENE SEPT. 14

The Missouri General Assembly will hold its annual veto session Sept. 14 but isn't expected to override any of the four bills or 32 line-item budget vetoes Gov. Mike Parson issued this year.

The session is expected to last no more than a few hours.

Legislation to provide income tax credits to benefit Missouri agriculture appears to be the only prospect for an override attempt. Although Parson favors the tax incentives, he vetoed the measure, House Bill 1720, because lawmakers set them to expire after just two years, which he said was too short a period to effectively boost agricultural investments.

Parson is asking lawmakers to repass the tax credits with expiration dates no shorter than six years before reauthorization is required in the special legislative session now scheduled to begin work on Sept. 14, the same day as the veto session.

There hasn't been any buzz about attempting overrides on the three other vetoed bills, which include separate measures relating to kratom regulations and county government financial statements, along with controversial legislation to grant onetime tax rebates to certain taxpayers that was grafted on to an unrelated bill pertaining to state employees.

The governor's 32 line-item vetoes striking a total of $644 million in spending authority from the fiscal year 2023 state budget likewise are expected to stand. The bulk of that amount came from a single line-item veto of $500 million in spending authority intended for the proposed tax rebates that had flawed wording.

A successful override requires two-thirds majorities in both legislative chambers -23 votes in the Senate and 109 in the House. Republicans currently outnumber Democrats 24-10 in the Senate and 107-48 in the House, which has eight vacancies.

DETAILS OF LEGISLATION STILL NOT PUBLIC

Days after a special legislative session to consider massive income tax cuts and income tax credits to benefit Missouri agriculture officially began, details of the specific language of the proposed legislation have yet to be announced.

Gov. Mike Parson's proclamation convening the special session set it to begin at noon on Sept. 6, and the 60-day constitutional clock for the session to end started ticking at that time.

But in an unprecedented move, Republican legislative leaders later announced neither chamber would actually convene the special session until Sept. 14, the same day the legislature's annual veto session begins.

Parson has asked the General Assembly to approve income tax cuts that he has estimated would cost the state about $700 million annually in lost revenue that supporters say would be at least partially offset by the cuts stimulating economic growth. The nonpartisan Missouri Budget Project has estimated the proposed cuts would reduce state revenue closer to $1.1 million annually.

The governor also is asking lawmakers to create or renew several income tax credits to benefit Missouri agriculture, many of which were in House Bill 1720 passed during this year's regular legislative session that the governor vetoed because it required the credits to be reauthorized after only two years which he said was too short a time to effectively boost agricultural investments. He has asked for such credits to be available for a minimum of six years before reauthorization is required.

They will include credits for investments to establish or improve urban farms including community gardens that are similar to what I proposed in House Bill 1570 during this year's regular session. The vetoed HB 1720 also included similar language, but required the credits to be reauthorized after only two years instead of after six years as I proposed.

The Missouri constitution provides that during special sessions lawmakers may only pass legislation the governor asks them to consider.

The special session must end no later than Nov. 5, three days before the Nov. 8 general election.

ASHCROFT FILES SUPREME COURT BRIEF

Missouri Secretary of State Jay Ashcroft announced Sept. 7 he has filed a brief with the U.S. Supreme Court in support of a case pushing a fringe legal theory that asserts state legislatures have absolute authority to determine election laws and are even free to ignore state constitutional requirements.

Ashcroft's brief backs efforts to reverse a North Carolina Supreme Court ruling that a new congressional map drawn by the state's Republican-controlled legislature that favors GOP candidates violates the state constitution.

The so-called "independent state legislature doctrine" claims the Elections Clause of the U.S. Constitution gives state legislatures the sole power to set congressional district boundaries, thus precluding state courts from reviewing their work for constitutional violations.

Constitutional scholars widely pan the theory, but it recently has gained traction among right-wing legal groups seeking to circumvent state constitutional protections relating to congressional redistricting and the conduct of elections.

The U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to hear the North Carolina case, Moore v. Harper, in its upcoming term that begins Oct. 3. The court has recently shifted far to the right ideologically, with conservative justices holding a 6-3 majority, creating concerns the court could upend long held legal standards governing how federal elections are conducted.

I joined other area residents at the annual Kansas City Remembrance Ceremony on September 11 at the First Responder Memorial in Mount Olivet Cemetery to personally pay my respects to the hundreds of fire fighters and scores of police officers who lost their lives while trying to save others on September 11, 2001. Also, many average citizens became first responders that day risking their lives to save others. To those we lost, you are loved and you are missed.
